

Around 75% of Vietnamese people currently live in the countryside, but as Vietnam moves increasingly towards urbanization, its agricultural workforce faces the prospect of losing its land and its way of life. With Vietnam's growing population also making less land available for farmers to work, families unable to sustain themselves are turning to the creation of various products in rural areas. These 'craft' villages have become the meeting place between rural and urban, agriculture and industry.

